A GENTLE INVITATION

When you feel off, it's not always obvious why.

Sometimes it's subtle.
A little disconnected.
A little overstimulated.
A little unlike yourself.

And often, those moments don't need a complete life reset or dramatic change.

Sometimes your body is simply asking for a small pause.
A small shift in attention.
A moment to come back to yourself.

That's what this guide is for.

Not another routine to perfect.
Just a few simple practices you can return to when you need them.

RESET 1

PAUSE

When something feels off, the instinct is often to keep moving.

To scroll.

To distract yourself.

To immediately move on to the next thing without noticing how you actually feel.

This is a small interruption to that.

Pause, even briefly.

Take one full breath.

Put both feet on the floor.

Step away from the noise for a moment.

Sometimes pausing is simply letting yourself acknowledge:

"Something feels off right now."

Not to fix everything immediately.

Just to create a little space between you and the autopilot.

Because sometimes awareness comes before clarity.

If you feel like going deeper:

What does "feeling off" usually look like for me?

RESET 2

COME BACK TO YOUR BODY

When you feel scattered, overstimulated, or disconnected, your attention is often pulled outward.

Toward notifications.

Thoughts.

Noise.

Stress.

Everything happening around you.

This is a small way to come back to yourself.

Notice:

your feet on the ground

your hands

your breathing

the tension in your shoulders or jaw

This might look like:

- Taking one full breath before responding to a message
- Unclenching your jaw while working
- Putting both feet on the floor during a stressful moment
- Stepping outside for one quiet minute without your phone

This isn't about solving everything.

Just reconnecting to where you are, one moment at a time.

If you feel like going deeper:

When do I feel most disconnected from my body?

RESET 3

SHIFT YOUR ENVIRONMENT

Sometimes when you feel mentally cluttered, overwhelmed, or stuck, your environment can start to feel the same way.

Not always dramatically.
Sometimes it's subtle.

A room that feels heavy.
Too much noise.
Too much stimulation.
A space that no longer feels supportive.

Instead of trying to reset everything, shift one small thing around you.

This might look like:

- Opening a window
- Stepping outside
- Clearing a surface
- Lighting a candle
- Moving something slightly
- Letting fresh air into the room

Small environmental shifts can help signal safety, calm, and movement to your nervous system.

You don't need a perfect space.
Just one that supports how you want to feel.

If you feel like going deeper:

What small changes in my environment tend to affect how I feel most?

RESET 4

SLOW YOUR BREATH

When your nervous system feels overwhelmed, stressed, or overstimulated, your breathing often becomes shorter and faster without you even noticing.

This is a small way to interrupt that.

Not by forcing yourself to “calm down.”
Just by slowing things slightly.

Try letting your exhale become a little longer than your inhale.

Not perfectly.
Not in a rigid way.
Just gently.

This might look like:

- Making your exhale twice as long as your inhale (i.e., inhale for 3 and exhale for 6).
- Taking one slower breath before responding to a message
- Exhaling fully while unclenching your shoulders or jaw
- Pausing for a breath before moving into the next task
- Letting yourself slow down for a moment to feel your breath instead of rushing automatically

Sometimes your body needs a reminder that it is safe to soften.

If you feel like going deeper:

What happens when I slow down, even a little?

RESET 5

STAY FOR A MOMENT

After a small reset, it's easy to immediately move on again.

To grab your phone.

Jump back into work.

Fill the silence.

Rush into the next thing before your body has time to catch up.

Instead, give yourself one more moment.

Let the quieter feeling settle in.

Let yourself actually notice the breath, the pause, or the shift you created.

Even briefly.

Sometimes the reset isn't just in the action itself.

It's in allowing yourself to stay with the feeling for a moment instead of rushing past it.

You don't need to force anything.

Just let yourself be there.

If you feel like going deeper:

Do I usually rush through moments like this, or allow myself to stay?

You don't need to change everything to feel different.

Sometimes the smallest shifts create the most space.

A breath.

A pause.

A quieter moment in the middle of the day.

Small things matter.

A QUIET MOMENT TO REFLECT

Gentle Reflections

If you feel like going a little deeper, here's a space for that.

No pressure.

Just a quiet moment to notice what's been coming up for you.

- When do I usually feel most off?
- What tends to help me feel more grounded or present again?
- Which of these small resets felt most supportive to me?
